pay for state-funded personal care attendants to allow them to live in their own apartments and get help with dressing, using the bathroom, and transferring from bed to chair.

Yet some of us live in the “cliffhangers,” as Patty Berne puts it, of the disability rights movement—the spaces where a white-dominated, single-issue, civil rights approach that depends on the ability to use lawsuits to achieve disability liberation leaves many of us behind.
Some of us are disabled folks who are able to access care attendants to help us live that are paid for by the state, Department of Health, or Social Services. Some of us are disabled people whose disability the state never approves of—so it’s not “real.” Some of us fear that letting anyone in to care for us will mean we are declared incompetent and lose our civil rights, so we guard the houses where we can be sick.
Some of us know that accepting care means accepting queerness, transphobia, fatphobia or sexism from our care attendants. Some of us are in the in-between of needing some care but not fitting into the state model of either Total and Permanent Disability or fit and ready to work—so we can’t access the services that are there. Many of us are familiar with being genuinely sick as hell and needing some help but failing the official crip exams because we can still cook, shop, and work, only slowly and when there is no other choice. Some of us are not citizens. Some of us make twenty bucks too much. Some of us will lose our right to marry if we go on state disability, or our access to work or housing. Some of us belong to Nations that will not accept state money. Some of us—always, and especially post-Trump, with the rise of fascism calling for the end of Medicaid, the ACA, and the ADA in the US, and socialized medicine and human rights legislation throughout the world—are continuously worrying about what happens when our precarious right to state-funded care goes away, and what our survival strategies will be then.

Moving Past Nightmare Towards Collective Access

In the face of systems that want us dead:

As Vancouver’s Radical Access

Maj people: if you don’t know how to do
been doing it for a long time, usual

we call them “my friend that helps

don’t call them anything at all—care

The care webs I write about here attendant care as the only way to the model of charity and gratitude, the desires of the disabled people run mix of able and disabled people to in “crip-made access”—access made turning on its head the model that we receive care, not give it or determine they are disabled only or involve dis-still work from a model of solidarity

other in mutual aid and respect.

I first learned of the term “mut in books like Ursula Le Guin’s The that quoted white guy theorists like and many other anarchist and antia
to mean a voluntary reciprocal exch mutual benefit. Mutual aid, as opp moral superiority of the giver over invent the concept of mutual aid—n

11 Radical Access Mapping Project, https://raa are attendants to allow them to live in dp with dressing, using the bathroom, snaf.
he “cliffhangers,” as Patty Berne puts it, — the spaces where a white-dominated, ch that depends on the ability to use liberation leaves many of us behind. hho are able to access care attendants y the state, Department of Health, or disabled people whose disability the not “real.” Some of us fear that letting an we are declared incompetent and rd the houses where we can be sick. care means accepting queerphobia, obia from our care attendants. Some eding some care but not fitting into Permanent Disability or fit and es the services that are there. Many siely sick as hell and needing some cans because we can still cook, shop, there is no other choice. Some of us twenty bucks too much. Some of us go on state disability, or our access along to Nations that will not accept es, and especially post-Trump, with end of Medicaid, the ACA, and the medicine and human rights legislation wisely worrying about what happens re-funded care goes away, and what on.

Moving Past Nightmare Toward Strategies for the Future of Collective Access

In the face of systems that want us dead, sick and disabled people have been finding ways to care for ourselves and each other for a long time. As Vancouver’s Radical Access Mapping Project says, “Able-bodied people: if you don’t know how to do access, ask disabled people. We’ve been doing it for a long time, usually on no money, and we’re really good at it.” Sometimes we call them care webs or collectives, sometimes we call them “my friend that helps me out sometimes,” sometimes we don’t call them anything at all—care webs are just life, just what you do.

The care webs I write about here break from the model of paid attendant care as the only way to access disability support. Resisting the model of charity and gratitude, they are controlled by the needs and desires of the disabled people running them. Some of them rely on a mix of able and disabled people to help; some of them are experiments in “crip-made access”—access made by and for disabled people only, turning on its head the model that disabled people can only passively receive care, not give it or determine what kind of care we want. Whether they are disabled only or involve disabled and non-disabled folks, they still work from a model of solidarity not charity—of showing up for each other in mutual aid and respect.

I first learned of the term “mutual aid” as an anarchist teenager, in books like Ursula Le Guin’s The Dispossessed and in a lot of zines that quoted white guy theorists like Kropotkin. All of these writers, and many other anarchist and anti-authoritarian writers, use the term to mean a voluntary reciprocal exchange of resources and services for mutual benefit. Mutual aid, as opposed to charity, does not connote moral superiority of the giver over the receiver. White people didn’t invent the concept of mutual aid—many precolonial (and after) Black,

Indigenous, and brown communities have complex webs of exchanges of care. However, given the presence of white anarchism as one of the biggest places that talk about ideas of mutual aid, it doesn't surprise me that one of the first examples of collective care I encountered was dreamed up by a white Southern disabled queer femme anarchist whose politics brought together disability and mutual aid.

THE PREQUEL: LOREE ERIKSON'S CARE COLLECTIVE

Hello Lovely People ...
For those of you who don't know me I am Loree Erickson, a queer femmegimp porn star academic who now lives in Toronto, ON but grew up in Leesburg, VA and lived in Richmond for 8 years. My work tends to focus on the intersections of radical queer, disability and sexuality bringing together personal experience, creativity (through video and photography), and theory to explore issues of explicit sexual representation, embodiment, and desirability. As well I theorize around personal assistance/care relationships and create alternative support structures. I also love sun, sparkly things, and social justice. I am coming to DC to present at a day long seminar for and by young women with disabilities at American University. Then, of course I have to come to RVA and see my people (as well as eat biscuits and gravy at 821 Cafe).

I arrive in DC Friday, around 1ish and am around until Monday morning. Then I am heading to Richmond till Wednesday eve. I am traveling with a friend who can help out with some of my care, but I am in need of friendly recruits to help as well. Plus it's an awesome opportunity to meet fabulous and friendly people who've been seen in too long!

How you can help:
I use a wheelchair and I need help with my personal care ne into/out of bed and going to the bathroom. I am also good at what I need help with is being able to be sorta buff. I'm not as bad as it seems. If you might be able to buddy you up with a friend. Two is better for safety! :) It doesn't really happen usually less than a few times a week. I usually pee at 12ish, 5ish, and 9ish. If you don't feel like it, that's completely fine.

If you are interested let me know as soon as possible so I can plan. Plus we are coming soon and I need your availability that you,

Help with any part of teh forwarding it to other nice people appreciated. Thanks so much ...

Can't wait to see/meet you Loree

Interviewer: "Your model of collective care is an integral part of our social understanding of..."
Care Work

Interests have complex webs of exchanges sense of white anarchism as one of the deas of mutual aid, it doesn't surprise es of collective care I encountered was disabled queer femme anarchist whose lity and mutual aid.

Care Collective

I know me I am Lorée Erickson, star academic who now lives in Leesburg, VA and lived in... work tends to focus on the interisability and sex/uality bringing vice, creativity (through video wory to explore issues of explicit bodiment, and desirability. As mal assistance/care relationships port structures. I also love sun justice. I am coming to DC to and by young women in a University. Then, of course I see my people (as well as eat cafe).

around 5ish and am around en I am heading to Richmond awing with a friend who can re, but I am in need of friendly s it's an awesome opportunity to meet fabulous and friendly people/see friends I have seen in too long!

How you can help:

I use a wheelchair and I am looking to recruit folks to help with my personal care needs (fancy words for getting into/out of bed and going to the bathroom). No experience needed (I am really good at talking folks through it plus what I need help with is pretty straight forward) and ya only have to be sorta buff, I weigh around 130lbs, but it is not as bad as it seems. If you're worried about lifting I might be able to buddy you up or maybe you can buddy yourself up with a friend. Two people makes it way easier and yay for safety! It doesn't take that long (around a 1 hour—usually less— to pee and a bit more to get into/ outta bed. I usually pee at 12ish, 5ish and then when I get into bed and wake up. If you don't have a lot of time, even one shift would be so extremely helpful.

If you are interested let me know or if you know anyone else who might be interested, please send this their way (I appreciate people of all genders helping me), I need to know as soon as possible so that I know how stressed out to be. Plus we are coming soo soon! Also if you can send me your availability that would be amazing.

Help with any part of this would be awesome and forwarding it to other nice people is also very much appreciated. Thanks so much...

Can't wait to see/meet you and your friends!!!

Lorée

Interviewer: "Your model of collective care includes disability as part of our social understanding of mutual care. What you are doing is helping to shift our collective social understanding of care. It's profoundly political."

Loree Erickson: [Nods her head] "Yeah, it really is. It's too bad that taking care of each other has to be radical."

Encountering Loree Erickson's artwork, and then learning about and witnessing her care collective, changed my life. Her artwork and disabled community organizing were some of the first places where I saw a femme disabled person talk about disability, femmeness, and desirability, or the concept of interdependence, or collective care as a thing that could exist in the world. Her queer femme anarchist disabled white Southern art, organizing, and self were everyday parts of my political reality in Toronto in the mid-2000s and had a huge impact on the city's activist communities. For many people in Toronto and beyond, her care collective has been both a groundbreaking model for alternative dreams of care making and a place to be brought into disability activism and culture.

Loree began her care collective in her twenties in Virginia as a survival strategy: the state's refusal to fund attendant care adequately (as is true most of the time with state social service) meant that the amount of money she got to pay attendants was below minimum wage. And often, when she was able to hire an attendant with DHSS money, they were homophobic and unsupportive of Erickson when she was watching queer films or hanging out with other queer friends. In response, Erickson fired her attendants, had a meeting with her friends, and came up with the vision to experiment with collective friend-made care together.

Her care collective continued when she moved to Toronto, partially because of her lack of ability to access state-funded home care attendants because of her not past fifteen years, her care collective non-disabled friends and community to help her with dressing, bathing, a do all the care work herself; she has of emailing, scheduling, and training travels away from her home base of and teach workshops, or to visit fri ask, via Facebook and email, for peo of her care team. In recent years, her fundraisers to purchase adaptive eq shifers who are poor low-income for as Loree gets older, and her commu.

Loree's care collective is not jus her the care she needs; it's a site of where many people learn about dis the nitty gritty) in action for the fir that upon moving to Toronto, her car political space. "It was more like mol new people, I was connecting with that collective care functions as anti- People were becoming radicalized participating in the collective. "It's lectures from the bathroom, but ye of our lives and so that's part of the care attendants because of her not being a permanent resident. For the past fifteen years, her care collective has been filled with disabled and non-disabled friends and community members who work shifts each week to help her with dressing, bathing, and transferring. She doesn’t have to do all the care work herself; she has friends who take on the admin work of emailing, scheduling, and training potential care shifters. When she travels away from her home base of Toronto to conferences, to lecture and teach workshops, or to visit friends and lovers, she or supporters ask, via Facebook and email, for people in that region to help and be part of her care team. In recent years, Loree and allies have planned small fundraisers to purchase adaptive equipment and compensate some care shifters who are poor/low income for their time and care work, especially as Loree gets older, and her community gets more disabled themselves.

In Loree's care collective, he something she both needs and di community, hang out with Loree, :

Loree’s care collective is not just a practical survival strategy to get her the care she needs; it’s a site of community and political organizing, where many people learn about disability politics (both the theory and the nitty-gritty) in action for the first time. In one interview, she notes that upon moving to Toronto, her care collective became a more explicitly political space. “It was more like mobilizing a community. I was meeting new people, I was connecting with folks, and I started to see the ways that collective care functions as anti-ableism training for folks,” she said. People were becoming radicalized around care and disability through participating in the collective. “It’s not like I’m giving workshops or lectures from the bathroom, but you know, we’re talking about both of our lives and so that’s part of the way that the education happens.”

In Loree’s care collective, her need for access is posited as something she both needs and deserves, and as a chance to build community, hang out with Loree, and have fun—not as a chore. This is drastically different from most ways care is thought of in the world, as an isolated, begrudgingly done task that is never a site of pleasure, joy, or community building.

13 Muna Mire and Mary Jean Hande, “The Pace We Need to Go: Creating Care Culture,” Action Speaks Louder: OIPRG-Toronto’s Field Manual for Those Who’ve Had Enough, Fall 2013, 8-9.

This is radical. It is a radical rewriting of what care means, of what disability means, taking anarchist ideas of mutual aid and crip-femm-ing them out. I've shown people Loree's fundraising video for the collective, where shots of her transferring to the toilet with the help of a care shifter are interspersed with footage of her and care shifters trading gossip and dating advice over breakfast. After seeing the video, one participant in a workshop on care I gave said, “It's really mind-blowing for me to see someone accessing care that's very intimate, without shame, and with everyone laughing and having a good time.”

Loree's care collective model is a deep possibility model, not a one-size-fits-all solution for everyone who needs care. Her collective working relies on her having access to a broad network of friends and acquaintances, a social and activist life where people know her and are interested in helping her out, something many people, especially sick, disabled, and mad people, are too socially isolated to be able to access. Although I admire her collective and have learned a lot from watching it, I also think about how there aren't a million collectives for low-income Black and brown autistic, physically disabled, or chronically ill people in Toronto. I think of the challenges myself and Black and brown friends and acquaintances have had finding people who are willing and able to do care for a week or a month, let alone years, especially when that care involves pain or mental health crises that may not have a resolution. I think about the ways Loree's willingness to offer emotional caregiving to her care shifters, her whiteness and extroversion and neurotypicality are factors that aid her in being able to access an abundance of care—factors not available to everyone.

I also think about the people I know who want and need the distance of having someone they don't know care for them. As a wheelchair-using, physically disabled Black femme frig, glad Loree's model works for her, b doesn't show up for a shift, I can't being liked or loved by the commu when I want to."

I think that all of these things collective is still an incredibly impt of accessing care that has made mo and others to dream.

CREATING COLLECTIVE ACCESS DETR

We know that for many of us it comes to traveling, navigating buildings, sidewalks, public the bathrooms, the places to the cost, the crowds, the door and so so so much more.

Would you like to be co and our allies/comrades who collective access?

What is collective access? We intentionally create collectives. Most of the time, access is needs it. It is up to you to sometimes, up to you and your dant (PA) or random friend. collective commitment and relegated to an afterthought. Access is complex. It is or getting disabled folks/crip.
says care is thought of in the world, task that is never a site of pleasure, writing of what care means, of what leas of mutual aid and cri femming fundraising video for the collective, e toilet with the help of a care shifter and care shifters trading gossip and seeing the video, one participant in a really mind-blowing for me to see intimate, without shame, and with od time.” is a deep possibility model, not a me who needs care. Her collective to a broad network of friends and life where people know her and are thing many people, especially sick, socially isolated to be able to access. I have learned a lot from watching it, million collectives for low-income disabled, or chronically ill people in myself and Black and brown friends, people who are willing and able to me years, especially when that care is that may not have a resolution. I ess to offer emotional caregiving to extraversion and neurotypicality are ccss an abundance of care—factors ow who want and need the distance are for them. As a wheelchair-using, physically disabled Black femme friend of mine remarked to me, “I’m glad Loree’s model works for her, but if someone drops me, if someone doesn’t show up for a shift, I can die. I don’t ever want to depend on being liked or loved by the community for the right to shit in my toilet when I want to.” I think that all of these things can be true at the same time. Loree’s collective is still an incredibly important example of a cri-created way of accessing care that has made more worlds of care possible for myself and others to dream.

CREATING COLLECTIVE ACCESS DETROIT, JUNE 2010—JUNE 2012

We know that for many of us, access is on our minds when it comes to traveling, navigating the city, movement spaces, buildings, sidewalks, public transportation, rides, the air, the bathrooms, the places to stay, the pace, the language, the cost, the crowds, the doors, the people who will be there and so so so much more.

Would you like to be connected to a network of crips and our allies/comrades who are working together to create collective access?

What is collective access? Collective Access is access that we intentionally create collectively, instead of individually.

Most of the time, access is placed on the individual who needs it. It is up to you to figure out your own access or, sometimes, up to you and your care giver, personal attendant (PA) or random friend. Access is rarely woven into a collective commitment and way of being; it is isolated and relegated to an afterthought (much like disabled people).

Access is complex. It is more than just having a ramp or getting disabled folks/crips into the meeting. Access is a Creating Collective Access (CCA) was a cripped femme-of-color-made piece of brilliance that came together in the summer of 2010. You can read much more about it at creatingcollectiveaccess.wordpress.com, but in my version of the story, CCA happened because three disabled queer Asian femmes were on a conference call to plan the workshops we were organizing at the 2010 Allied Media Conference (AMC) and US Social Forum (USSF)—an enormous social justice gathering bringing tens of thousands of people to Detroit to imagine a revolutionary future—and we were completely fucking stressed out about how we were going to survive those conferences.

This is a very common disability experience: getting ready to go travel to a conference and having your freak-out about how badly the whole thing will fuck up your body. Will the airport break your wheelchair? Will you get sick from a fragrance exposure? Will the accessible van or ASL-prompted in the conference material just not be there? Where will the food be, and is it stuff you can eat? Will you be 1,000% overstimulated

by thousands of people talking ab

15 “Crip” is a word used by many people in disabled communities as a fuck you, in-your-face reclamed word, short for cripple—similar to how queers have reclaimed the word “queer.” Not everyone likes it or uses it; people have complex feelings about it, and it’s not great for abled people to use it. Leroy Moore coined the term “Krip” to avoid using a term that also is the name of the Crip gang street economic organization.
by thousands of people talking about intense things? What if you have a panic attack or suicidal ideation 2,000 miles away from home and your usual supporters’ access hacks? In short, how will you negotiate the world away from the crip survival skills you have where you live? We’re used to feeling that our disability experiences are private, embarrassing, and not to be spoken about—especially crips who may be working mostly in non-disabled social justice communities—and conference and travel bring those feelings on even more so.

But in 2010, some of us came together at a nascent moment of disability justice organizing. We came together as disabled queer and trans people of color, talking, sometimes haltingly, about our intersectional lives, and talking about what disability organizing would mean that didn’t leave any part of ourselves behind. We were rooted in a ground of other disabled queer and trans people of color, who were finding each other through online portals like the Azolla Story (a closed online portal for disabled queer and trans people of color, through the cultural, political work of Sins Invalid and the Disability Justice Collective, through our own blogs and chance meetings in crip-of-color hallways, coming and going. And on that call, Stacey, Mia, and I had a profound moment of clarity. We didn’t have to choose between handling our access needs on our own or crossing our fingers that the conference and the airlines would come through to take care of us. We could experiment in coming together and caring for each other. What would it be like to create a space that centered Black and brown disabled people, that was led by disabled queer femmes of color, where instead of able-bodied people begrudgingly “helping” us, we were doing it for ourselves? We didn’t know, but we knew it would be the polar opposite of so much existing disabled spaces that were dominated by white crips and their casual and overt racism, so much mainstream space where we were always on hold with access services. We didn’t know what we were doing, and we knew what we were doing. We knew we were creating something revolutionary.

So we did it, and we did it quick, in the last three weeks before we had to go to Detroit—threw up a quick WordPress site asking for other sick and disabled queer, mostly Black and brown, people to find us, for us to find each other. We knew we couldn't create access for thousands of people, but we wanted to see what we could do with the resources we had.

And it worked: sick and disabled queer people of color found us, through email and Facebook posts and friends of friends, and, once we got there, through running into us on-site. It came together in that effortless-feeling way that happens sometimes when something's time has come. There was so much creativity, hustle, and fun—and disabled queer of color brilliance. One member of CCA drove up from North Carolina to Detroit with two other disabled POC and her personal care attendant in her wheelchair-accessible van. That van legally fits four people, but I have photos of thirteen crips crammed into it and driving through Detroit, laughing our asses off. We shared information about why fragrance-free body care products are important and shared the actual products, especially those for Black and brown hair and skin, with each other, including with people who'd never heard of "fragrance-free" before but were down if it meant we were able to be together. We booked a few accessible dorm suites so we could sleep and hang out with each other.

CCA was one of the first places I ran into what I would later call cross-disability solidarity, and more than that, the reality of our different disabilities not being a liability, that there could be ways we supported each other. One person selectively used some "poor, cute cripple" skills to charm the dorm staff and get them to unlock the fourth-floor kitchen so we could cook and store groceries. One neurodivergent person who didn't have mobility problems walked a mile to the closest restaurant to load up someone else's spare meal orders and walked the food back to

Being less isolated helped us that were effective because they or not just one individual crips

The AMC ordered in fragrance-free Detroit back then didn't have an stocked Dr Bronner's unscented. Ti we built also helped us survive the challenges (like, no wheelchair-ac on all the promo material, and wh person we talked to was like, "Can ask about the shuttle?" and didn't we can't, because we can't physically texting, "I am spooning out, I ne passed out at one end of the con there as fast we could, and them s roll up made all the difference.

We didn't just survive the con one Committed to leaving no one behi in a big, slow group of wheelchair people. Instead of the classic able-t us were used to, where able-bodied rate and didn't notice we were twol as slow as the slowest person and r got out of the way. Instead of going chose to stay in, and ate and shared us, it was our first time doing that CCA changed everyone who who just heard about it. It was jus their communities transformed.